Inter- and intra-session reliability of the reactive agility test (RAT), performed on a continuous and circular running track, has never been reported. The present study aimed to assess the inter- and intra-session reliability of the RAT in young soccer players. Sixteen soccer players (10.9±1.2 years) performed the RAT twice (test-retest) within the same day. A timer measured RAT performance, and a five-camera motion analysis system recorded ground reaction forces. The coefficient of variation (CV), and intraclass correlation coefficient (ICC) and standard error of measurement (SEM) were calculated as indices of reliability. The CV for RAT performance was 6.55% (test), 12.05% (retest), and 11.15% (inter-session), and ICC was 0.93 (95% confidence interval 0.85-0.98), 0.91 (95% confidence interval 0.81-0.96), and 0.82 (95% confidence interval 0.64-0.92) for performance, the first and last trial, respectively. The CV for total contact time was 0.27% (test), 0.53% (retest), and 0.49% (inter-session), and ICC was 0.83 (95% confidence interval 0.61-0.94), 0.74 (95% confidence interval 0.44-0.89), and 0.71 (95% confidence interval 0.39-0.87) for the first and last trial, respectively. The CV for total knee angular displacement was 1.69% (test), 3.14% (retest), and 2.93% (inter-session), and ICC was 0.93 (95% confidence interval 0.85-0.98), 0.88 (95% confidence interval 0.76-0.94), and 0.81 (95% confidence interval 0.61-0.91) for the first and last trial, respectively. There were no differences between test and retest for most variables, and the level of reliability was considered sufficient for
